

GLSDS Meeting Minutes

2/21/2016

1:30PM at MBG

Mariel Tribby gave our group a presentation: 'Mission Not Impossible: Perennial Borders.' Mariel manages the Bavarian, Alpine and Rock Gardens at MBG, and is working in a wild sourcing project that has identified three Biodiversity Hotspots; 1) The Caucasus, 2) Altar Sayer and 3) The Carpathian Region. These 3 areas have somewhat similar weather to that here in St. Louis and MBG wild sources plant seeds from these regions, especially of endangered species, to test and see if they can grow here.

For each of these 3 Hotspots Mariel showed us photos of the climate, topography typical flora and how many species had been identified there, how many were endemic, and how many rare or endangered. Research botanists from MBG and other botanical institutions collect seeds from these areas. She spoke to us of controls for this type of research; The Garden can't release seeds from these plants, because they are brought into the US under strict USDA controls to try and prevent escapees that may be invasive or carry some type of disease. She mentioned that one of the forbs she had growing in the Perennial Border by the Linnaean Greenhouse had to be removed because it had been found to be invasive in another botanical garden. Many gardeners in our group really liked some of the flowers she showed us and had wanted to know where we might get seeds. She said it takes years to get something approved for commercial sale.

Mariel spoke of the challenges she faces in implementing this program, and some things she might like to do in the future, like adding interpretive signage, and increasing the number of endemic, rare and threatened species in the Garden. The group found her presentation fascinating.
